THE TEXT

About two million people in Morocco live in the Argan forest area, many of them depend on the forest for their livelihood.

[1] Across the Atlas Mountains, women's cooperatives that produce and sell argan oil are flourishing. These cooperatives help preserve Moroccan heritage while giving rural women a stronger voice in their families and communities. They can take decisions about argan prices, how to sell it as well as decisions related to the finances and management of their families. The oil they produce is often called "liquid gold"; its price is constantly increasing. More importantly, this work gives them independence, a steady income, and the chance to preserve and share their culture.

[2] In 2005, King Mohammed VI launched the National Human Development Initiative (known as INDH). The goal of the program is to reduce social inequalities, and also provide citizens, mainly vulnerable groups, with better access to social services such as employment, health and education. INDH has since supported over 22000 projects and created more than 7700 cooperatives run by women. Today, thanks to the program, women are contributing to their communities in Morocco, showing how tradition and modern development can go hand in hand.

[3] Argan cooperatives produce thousands of tons of argan oil annually, around 10% of it is for export. Many women have also learned how to read and do business thanks to the opportunities and trainings offered by the cooperatives. This has helped them acquire the skills necessary to manage their businesses in terms of advertising, sales and accounting. The total value of argan oil market in Morocco was estimated at $150 million in 2024. The market is expected to reach $287 million by 2033.

[4] The cooperatives have been successful and much of the export goes to large global beauty brands like L'Oréal and Aveda. The Body Shop, a local brand in the UK, also works with Moroccan cooperatives from which it obtains organic argan oil for body butter, face creams and bathing products. However, small cooperatives still face the challenges of locally marketing their products and having access to global markets. To overcome these challenges, some of them rely on local fairs and festivals to display and sell their products to the locals.
